

The Story of the Japanese Crane

Once upon a time, there were two brothers. One of them was very greedy, he wanted to take all his father's inheritance. The father left the chest with the money to the elder, the main brother, and the bird to the younger. One but the elder one had little money, he did not say that the younger was entitled to a bird-crane, and took everything for himself and drove him out of the house.

The younger brother was forced to leave the house. One day, he was sitting on the shore of the lake and saved a small chick that fell out of the nest and got tangled in the tall grass. And when he took it to the nest, he saw such a beautiful bird - it was just tall, slender on long legs with a beautiful white neck and a long beak. It was a bird crane.

He remembered that the same one lives in their garden. One day my father caught a bird that was shot by a hunter and it stayed with them to live. The bird thanked him for saving the chick. But it was still very sad and the younger brother asked the reasons for his sadness.

The bird told him that it was very sad for its crane, which was shot by hunters. The younger brother realized that this was the crane that he had inherited. He was determined to help the unfortunate bird and bought it from his greedy brother. The crane family was united. They were very grateful to the man for his help.

